M. Taine's "Notes on England."
(From the Paris Review.)

XXV.—FRENCH GRASS AND ANTIQUARIANISM.
Dined with T. The ladies explained to me the training of young girls. In well-to-do or wealthy families they all learn French, German, Italian, in general from infancy, through nurses and foreign governesses. Commonly they begin with French; nearly all speak it fluently, and several without an accent. I have cited the example I have encountered. They read Dante, Manzoni, Schiller, and Goethe, our Classics, Chateaubriand, and some moderns. Many learn a little Latin; that will be serviceable for the education of their children, or of their young brothers. Several learn natural history, botany, mineralogy, geology; they have a taste for all natural things; and in the country, at the sea side, in the frequent journeys, they can see minerals, shells, fossil collections; besides, that suits the English habits, which consists in storing up facts; thus they are more instructed, and more easily instructed, than among us. Another motive is, that many of the young girls are married, and that it is requisite to prepare an occupation for them beforehand. Lady M. cited the case of a family in her own neighborhood, where there are five unmarried daughters, all beautiful; the oldest ones are thirty-five and thirty-six. This is because they have been brought up in luxury, and have scarcely any dowry. Frequently a father only gives his daughter a sum equivalent to the income of the eldest son and heir; and moreover, he obliges the gentleman who offers himself to make a settlement on his daughter of two hundred, three hundred, four hundred pounds sterling yearly, whereas she will have the entire control when married, and which will be her pin money. This condition keeps away many suitors; besides, it is granted that one must marry for love, settled living; now, it often happens that one does not feel this liking, or that one does not inspire it. Hence many girls miss the chance and remain spinsters. There are some in almost every family, the position of which being very well filled. They help to rear the children, superintend a part of the household, preserve, make up the linen cupboard, make herbariums, paint in water-colours, read, write, become learned. Many compose moral romances, and sometimes very good novels; Miss T. cited the case of the author of "John Halifax," Miss Thackeray, and others, are known; I find frequent among authors, there are some of the first class—Mrs. Gaskell, Miss Evans, Elizabeth Browning; the two last possess genius. Reason again the translations: numerous German and French works have been translated—and well translated—by women. Others write magazines, compose small popular treatises, join a society, teach classes of poor children. The constant concern is to find an employment for their families, or to acquire a talent which serves as a remedy for weariness. The highest rank is not absolved. Witness the occupation of the Royal Family—the Queen and her daughters send water-colours, engravings, drawings done by themselves to charity. One of the most cultivated and most active ones in the kingdom; each one thus takes up one or two special subjects, labours at some improvement in agriculture, in science—some beneficent work or institution.

This life is serious, and all, even young girls, know that they must prepare themselves and provide themselves for it. N. who comes to England and every married one of his old friends, enquires the father of a family, who to him—"I am put out, my daughter Jane is 24, does not marry, frequently shuts herself up in the library, and reads solid works." "What dowry will you give her?" "Two thousand pounds sterling." "And your sons?" "The eldest will have the estate; the second a nice which yields five thousand pounds; the third five thousand pounds to Miss Jane." This phrase opened up vistas to the father; he gave her the five thousand pounds. Miss Jane had been married, she has a baby; she was made to be a mother; it would have been a pity to have converted her into a learned, expectant spinster; if suitors do not offer themselves, it is because the style of the house is too great for her; for what I desire, is the companion, the good sense, the courage of the young girl who, seeing herself in a blind alley, alters her course without a murmur, and silently sets herself to study. In none of the houses which I have entered in London or in the country have I seen a journal of the fashions. One of my English friends, who has resoured in France informs me that there are no journals of fashions. "The whole is serious—substantial. Witness a contrast in the provincial mansion among us the journals of fashions with illuminated sketches, patterns of the last style of bonnets, explanations of a piece of embroidery, little sentimental stories, honeyed compliments to female readers, and above all the correspondence of the directress with her subscribers on the last page, a masterpiece of absurdity and inanity." It is in vain that the father collects can digest such slanders. A dress badly made is more bearable than an empty head. I copy the titles of some articles, all written by women, in the Transactions of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science. "Education by Means of Workhouses," by Louise Twining; "District Schools for the English Poor," by Barbara Collett; "A Republic in the Principality of Education to Lower-class Schools," by Mary Carpenter; "Actual State of the Colony of Mettray," by Florence Hill; "Hospital Statistics," by Florence Nightingale; "The Condition of Working Women in England and France," by Desse Parke; "Slavery in America, and its Influence upon Great Britain," by Sarah Redmond; "Improvement of Nurses in America," by Dr. G. C. Wilson; "Report of the Society for Promoting Employment to Women," by Jane Corbett. Most of these authors are not married, several are secretaries of active associations, of which the Review I have just cited is the central organ; one of these associations supplies women with work, another visits the workhouses, another the sick. All these articles are instructive and useful. The custom of keeping classes of visiting the poor, of conversing with men, discussion, study, personal observation of facts, have yielded their fruits; they know how to observe and reason; they go to the bottom of things, and they comprehend the true principle of all improvement. Mary Carpenter says, "It is necessary above all, and as the first aim, to develop and direct the infant's will, and to make the principal soldier, as the most serviceable of all the co-operators in the education which is given to him." One cannot be corrected, improved but by oneself, the instinctive personal effort, self-government are indispensable from without, but spring up from within. Whoever has pursued English novels knows with what precision and what justice these authors depict characters; frequently a person who has lived in the country, in a small ret, busied with domestic cares, finds herself obliged to write a novel in order to gain her bread, and one discovers she understands the human heart better than a professional psychologist. To be instructed, learned, useful, acquire convictions, impart them to others, employ powers and im-
